PAYDAY: A Fiery Ending to Fast-Paced Intrigue and Adventure in Guatemala

EXCERPT

“I saw his landing lights on final and kept watching as he brought the Stationair down towards the runway. He set it down smoothly, then the unexpected happened as a bike-rider rode out on the runway 500 feet in front of him. I pressed the button on the microphone to warn Mike, but before I could speak he reacted to the emergency. I heard the Stationair engine cough and then accelerate to full power and watched as the plane seemed to suspend itself, undecided whether to stay on the ground or take to the air. They were quickly overtaking the bike rider who was totally unaware of what was happening. The rider finally heard the roar of the plane behind him and looked over his shoulder. He immediately fell down to his right as the Stationair skimmed over him grabbing for air. I could see Mike’s face as he pulled back on the control, climbing the plane on the border of a stall, ten feet above the ground, fifteen, twenty and then he veered left away from the center of the runway towards us, and roared directly over our Skymaster!”

“I reached in the Skymaster, took the microphone and radioed Mike: “Mike, do you read me? Is everyone okay on board, Mike?...”
